Anatolian agriculturalists who brought cultivation to the continent

The first European farmers migrated from the other side of the Aegean, descended from Anatolians who adopted the agricultural lifestyle 10,000 years ago. They were a mix of foragers related to European hunter-gatherers, and a mysterious population to the south that was more distant to these Pleistocene Europeans than the people of East Asia or Australia were. These people not only brought the cultivation of cereals to Europe, but they introduced various...
